

1. Read the passage and answer the questions that follow:

Our journey uphill to Bandipur was branched off the Prithvi Highway about two kilometers west of Dumre on the way to Pokhara. In less than an hour from Dumre we reached the medieval town as we found ourselves almost a century back in time. History says that Newars who fled Kathmandu Valley settled in Bandipur area. Newar traders from Kathmandu soon started flooding the area after the conquest of Kathmandu Valley by Prithvi Narayan Shah. The place was just as our friends had told us. With its ancient cobbled streets and medieval ambience displayed by old homes that exhibit glorious 18th century architecture. At the northeast end of Bazaar, was the main shopping strip. Nearby stands the ornate two-tiered Bindabasini temple dedicated to Goddess Durga, the guardian deity of the town. Needless to say, we spent the weekend just loitering around the town, making short trips to nearby temples, viewpoints and some mysterious caves.

Bandipur is probably the only example of a town that is truly a living museum of Newar culture. Its winding lanes are lined with tall Newar houses and people here seem to live, as they had done years before. It is somewhat hard to believe that a town tucked away somewhere up in the hills and barely three hours drive away from Kathmandu has by default managed to escape the ravages of modern day development. It seems like time stops in the town of Bandipur.

After spending the weekend we unwillingly caught the bus to dusty, dirty, crowded, polluted and impersonal 21st century Kathmandu to face the life once more. The teeming metropolis soon made us realize what we had been missing. The hangover of Bandipur has however remained so strong that we have decided on another trip to Bandipur in the near future.
